"I can't—and yet, after all, I don't know why not. I will tell you! I was going to say that, if it had not been for you that night at the theatre I should carry with me now a more vivid recollection of her. I saw her first. She was looking down out of the box, and I thought that never had I seen a more beautiful woman. Her face thrilled me. But then you came forward from the back of the box like a white vision against the dark background—and the footlights on the stage shone up into your eyes, turning them into lewels, your hair to a halo of gold. After that I looked no more at her. I wish to Heaven that I had!

"For the last forty hours I would have given much if I had never seen you at all," he went on. "That letter you left for me was a blow, and I — But I feel differently now. True, something has gone out of my life that can never come back. But you have given me the memory of a dear mother and, of course, the hope of great worldy advantages besides.
